There is something so entertaining about hearing animal sounds in other languages.

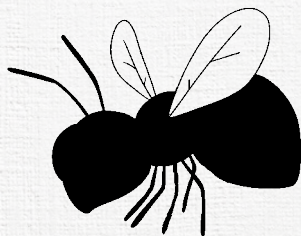

Presumably, the sound a cat makes in Greece is basically the same as one would in Pittsburgh, or on the streets of Rio, or in front of the pyramids in Giza. So why don't all languages represent those meows in the same way?

Every language uses its own set of sounds in its words, and each language also has particular rules about how to combine sounds as well as where they can go in words. For example, words in Spanish never start with the combination "sp" (they have to have an "e" before the "s"), and even though English speakers can make a "ng" sound in the middle or at the end of a word, no English words start with this sound.

The language YOU speak also shapes which sounds you hear, and how you imagine animals sounding when they make noise. So the way a language represents the noise a pig makes, for example, can tell us about what sounds exist in that language and how they form words
